Let me preface this article: this is about dating insight, not marriage insight. If you are looking for some marriage advice, check if Dr. Phil's available (good luck with that). Anyway, here are some of my favorite dating clichés and the truths behind them.

There aren't any good single women out there. All the good women are taken.

Now that is just silly: I'd bet that you have not met every woman out there. The problem with most men is that they think that a beautiful, intelligent, single woman will magically appear in their social circle. I don't know about everyone else, but I got a bicycle instead of a cute blonde the last time I asked Santa for beautiful woman.

Man up and take action—what are you doing to give yourself the best chance of meeting a great woman? Go to the best events where the most people congregate. First Friday comes to mind as the once a month, can't-miss event. And if you have a specific type, go to places where your type might frequent. If you like the artsy sophisticated type, perhaps the Birthday Bash isn't your best bet. Try Art After Dark instead. The beach is a great place to meet—you guessed it—chic surfer girls. Check out the Midweek, listen to the radio, look at event fliers or dosomethingtonight.com for some ideas. Real men get out there and relentlessly pursue what they desire in life.

I cannot meet the type of girl I am looking for at a nightclub or bar.

I used to believe that I could not meet my type of girl at a nightclub. But, I realized that I was limiting myself to girls that only my friends and I knew. Why would I want to limit myself to only women I meet at work, or women that friends introduce me to? Out of all the women I met in bookstores, at the grocery store, at work, or through friends, I am currently exclusively dating a woman that I met standing outside of a nightclub.

Most men I encounter have a very strong opinion about the type of woman that you can meet at a night club. They believe that it is only possible to meet “Party girls” at a night club. I
